

In less than a month, it will be two years since my husband Scott died suddenly on his 52nd birthday. On the night that it happened, I thought that my life was over. I was scared, so scared that I wouldn't survive; wouldn't have money, wouldn't be able to support our daughters, wouldn't even be able to lift my head and go back to work. I did. I did all of those. Some things were easy to do, others were very difficult. I called them hard things. I did another hard thing today, I would tell family or friends. Sometimes to let the scream or punch come out in a different manner, I wrote. I wrote when I felt overwhelmed. I wrote when I felt angry and when I observed unfairness to myself or others. I wrote to figure myself out. You see, I survived. He had life insurance, I had a job. There was money. My daughters are amazing and I have been able to support them as well as them working themselves, even though they are taking full loads of classes. I went back to work after a little more than a week, because the people there loved me and hugged me and asked how I was every day, and I needed that. I decided to share some of the writings on July 14, 2013. It would have been our 29th wedding anniversary. As I got likes, encouragements and comments, I kept writing and sharing. I was addicted. Finding the right kickoff topic, comparison or turn of a phrase became an obsession. I started to call myself a writer and wonder if I could make a living by doing just that.
