Not illustrated. 1758 Excerpt: ...that this dissolution was the sole cause of the great alterations, which have since happened in the constitution of England; yet so far, it is obvious and certain, that added to the dissipation of the church-lands by Henry the VIIIth and the alienation of great part of the crown-lands by queen Elizabeth, the dissolution of entails produced that transition of property from the lords to the commons, which so soon after made the commons when possessed of almost all the land property of the kingdom, too powerful for both the nobility and the king so insolent, as by a vote to declare the nobles no necessary part of the constitution, and by a publick trial and publick execution, to put their sovereign to death. The same desire of reviving; the spirit of the feudal law, at a time when that spirit was decaying, which had introduced the statute de donis into England, introduced likewise the artifice of entails into Scotland. But as the general bent of the nation against the strictness of the feudal system, came much later into Scotland, than into England; the attempts of particular persons to revive the effects of that system, were necessarily more late too, in the one nation than in the other. As long as a great part of the lands in the country were unalienable beyond a half; as long as there was not a sufficient commerce, to cause a considerable fluctuation of land property; and even when land came more into commerce, as long as the great families were powerful enough to defy the law, and to laugh at execution by appraisings used against their estates; there was no need of entails. In the highlands of Scotland, at this day, entails are far less frequent than in the low-countries. But
